ITALY

Etruscans and Greek settlers produced wine in Italy before the rise of the Romans, who developed the ancient world's most extensive wine culture. Evidence indicates that vines were planted widely across the peninsular "boot" by the 3rd century, with special concentration in areas close to Rome. Today, Italy offers an astonishing array of wines, thanks to innumerable indigenous varieties that have been protected by proud local wine cultures.

DISCOVER

FEUDO MONTONI

Feudo Montoni has been producing top-quality wines on its historic grounds since 1469, and is currently overseen by Fabio Sireci, the third generation of a family dedicated to producing the most refined expressions of this long-cultivated terroir.

LABELS

ORGANIC FARMER

Sireci is particularly proud of the organic farming methods, artisanal cellar practices and renewable energy sources he's implemented and maintained, which he says preserves the grapes' natural flavors and nuances. "We keep the vines rustic, so the foliage is free to express itself. The vineyards are not fertilized—we condition the land by sowing broad beans and peas, and we do not use any chemical products."

Climate

SUPER TUSCAN

Note

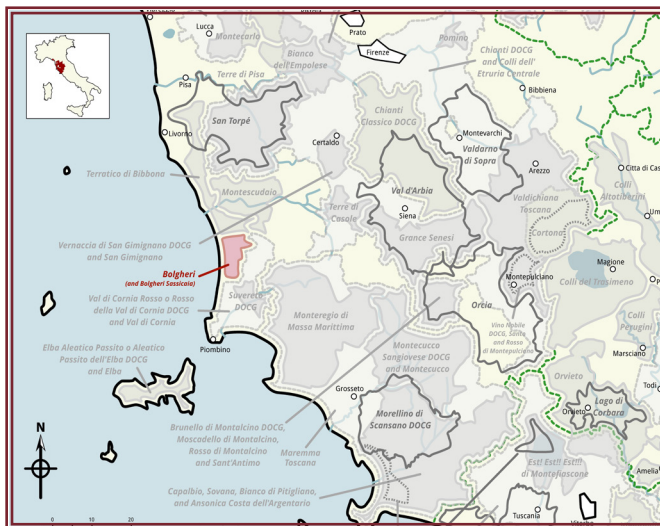

The term “Super Tuscan” gained popularity in the 1970s & 1980s when some Tuscan winemakers, dissatisfied with the restrictions of the traditional appellation system, began producing wines that didn’t conform to those regulations. While Super Tuscans are known for their innovative blending practices and often include international grape varieties, Montalcino is a traditional, single-varietal wine exclusively made from Sangiovese. Both categories represent the diversity & excellence of Tuscan winemaking, each with its unique characteristics & historical significance

Montalcino

The Montalcino wine region is not only renowned for its Brunello wines but also for the picturesque landscape and historic villages that make it a popular destination for wine enthusiasts. The combination of Sangiovese, terroir, and traditional winemaking practices has elevated Brunello di Montalcino to the pinnacle of Italian wine

Bolgheri

The Bolgheri wine region is located on the Tuscan coast in Italy and is renowned for producing some of Italy’s most prestigious and sought-after wines. The region gained international recognition for its Bordeaux-style blends, innovative winemaking, and the birth of the Super Tuscan movement.
